In France, in the time of the Napoleon, the resumption was brought about by diting the currency, and in Great Britain durin the same epoch by appreciating its value to the gold value. Yet in both instances the immediate results were similar, and the recoil from the previous expansion was almost equally disastrous. Of the effect in England ther some idea from the following extract from porary historian :-

a the memorable lat of May, 1823, drew near, the tary bankers, as well as the Bank of England, natury prepared themselves by a gradual narrowing of reirculation for the dreaded hour of gold and silver ments on demand and the withdrawal of the small is. We have already seen the fall in prices produced this universal narrowing of the paper circulation, effects of the distress produced all over the country, consequence of this fail, we have yet to see. The reas, ruin and bankraptey which now took place ouniversal, affecting both the great interests of land trade. But among the handlords, whose estates were henced by mortgoges, jointures, settlements, legalized, the effects were most marked and out of the nary course. In hundreds of cases, from the tradous reduction in the price of land which now took e, the estates barely seld for as much as would pay the mortgages, and hence the owners were stripped if and made beggars. Amidst the doubts, fears and real want of confidence caused by appaling ruin the dowed from the sudden drawing in of the paper, by the bloody outrages and bitter persecutions which is flowed from the effects of that ruin, it was felt seary to attempt to draw, if possible, the ties this of the middling classes of the nation to the funding paper system still closer, and to add, if such a thing d be accomphished, to the strength and number of eties.

return to specie payments in this country is certain; and the evils which other countries have suffered in their rethe will of the people, specie payments will be some day forced upon us, for the present inflation will even tually culminate in public distrust, and then may come a time, as in England in 1825, when goods will be only obtainable for gold or by barter. Meanwhile, however, much of the evil financial consequences of the war may be avoided by a gradual funding of a portion of he currency. This, without materially affecting the price of gold, will tend to lower prices, which are at present towering far above the specie level, causing an undisproportion between the relative prices o and domestic commodities, which is partially neutralized by the high tariff stantly adding to the volume of the paper money in circulation, and some such counterpoise as the contemplated funding process presents must be established if we are to avoid the evils of a continued inflation of prices, to be

The Public Blen of Texas—How They are Passing Away.

[From the Galveston Bulletin, Sept. 1.]

The men who have controlled public affairs in Texas, although not the foremost in the war, are passing away. General Sam Houston, who was, all mal, one of the greatest men of his time, was serving out his term as Governor when the storm came. He did everything except the one only possible thing—that of resorting to arms—to stay it. He was huried from power by a convention whose authority he denied. Lieutenant Governor Clark was installed in his place. General Houston's sun went down annoist the crushing storm which he had foretoid, but which few heeded. A few papers noticed the great man's death in meagre paragraphs. What was an old man's life, whose prophecies were a reproach, amidst so many?

Edward Clark entered the lists, for re-election. He was opposed by General Chambers and Frank Lubbock. The "fervency and ceal" of Lubbock carried him in by "a tight squeeze." We pause not to speak of the administration of Clark or Lubbock. Their chronicles will be as short and as pointedly condensed as those of many kings of the Jews. "They remembered not the God of their fathers, but run after strange gods; and worshipped their abominations." Lubbock is a prisoner, awaiting the course of offended law. Clark has just buried he next more unfortunate competitor, who jostled him of the track—Pendleton Murrah. They were exiles in a foreign land, surrounded by Wigfall, Oldham, Terrell, Flournoy and a host of other greater and smaller leaders. General Thomas J. Chambers, who was the competitor of Governor Murrah, was assassinated during the last year of the revolution. A few papers found room to chronicle the fact, though not room for indignation to condemn the hellish act.

year of the ravelution. A few papers found room to chronicle the fact, though not room for indignation to condern the hellish act.

Chief Justice Hemphili died soon after his ignoble de feat for a seat in the Confederate Congress. Some say of a broken heart. He was a sensitive man, who had never before mis with disappointment.

We have already noticed his successful competitor. General Wani, his unsuccessful competitor, had pledged himself to swallow all the blood which should be shed in the cause of secssion. Poor man he leat more blood from a shattered arm, at the battle of failine, than would have been comfortable to drink. And at the same cannage he saw his impetuous companions, Scurry and Randolph go down. This was one of those "glories victories" which so terribly deceived the Southern people.

The great political leader of the "organization." John Marshall, lost his life at Gaines' Mill. It is not for us to complain of the ingratitade of his political followers, who found no note of praise or honor for the man. Indeed, it seems to have been one of the features of the work of destruction to see companions and champions fall and literally to "leave the dead to bury the dead." Public honors were paid to Hemphill, McLeod, McCulloch, Scurry, Randolph and Buchel; and something like substantial sympathy was started for the families of Generals Sidney Jonnston and Thomas Green; but we fear that these efforts have failen with the cause for which they died.

Among those anxious to serve the State in its last terribbe throes was J. H. Reagan. Unfortunate Reagan's sun went down with Davis. He was a Union man, with Houston and Hamilton, but had not the wisdom of the one nor firmness of the other. We will not pursue the melancholy list further to-day. Those who believe themselves still followers in an organized "secession party" are sadly mistaken. The men and their power fell before the cause surrendered. The people must act upon enlightened principles for themselves.

Jenkins in Prussia.

[From the Liverpool (Eng.) Courier, August 23.]

The Prussian consul at this port was informed yesterday by a telegram that the manager of one of the Berlin banks had absconded, after having obtained thirteen thousand thalers by means of forgery. It was anticipated that he would make his way to Liverpool. A description of the missing gentlemen was placed in the hands of Mr. Superintendent Kehoe, of the Liverpool police force, and detective Hogarth was instructed to institute inquiries, and keep a strict look out for the delinquent refugee. A good scent was soon obtained, and after tracing him to several places, the detective succeeded in apprehending him in a public house in the neighborhood of Kent street, where he gave the name of be Petrie. The sum of about six hundred pounds in English money was also recovered, which had been in the poasession of De Petrie. The prisoner will be sent to Berlin for trial.
